Are you the most loyal person in your house, or is it your job to be a hero to others? That's the question facing us across the world as people in Afghanistan continue to face hardship and uncertainty around the globe. If you answered the third question correctly, you might be one of those who are currently fighting to win back freedom and justice for Afghan women, people who are victims of violence around the world, or perhaps you are just a soldier helping people in need. Or something in between. No matter how you answer the questions on hero questions, it's important to know what role heroes play in our world today. These question will help you know who the heroes are in your community, and who you need to follow them.

I had a driver's license, and I had had a CDL. But neither of those documents had any information on where I was from—as if something had changed. That's not to say that I had never heard of my country before. In fact, my family had lived there for generations—though I'd gone to school outside in an independent school, and I never became a part of its community. They are there to fight wars, to carry the burden of violence and oppression around the globe (and in your neighborhood too) and to stand up for what is right. In China, for example, a hero could be someone who serves local people or works with government agencies to help them. Sometimes heroes are individuals, such as a physician who tries to help patients in need, or those fighting for justice, or a journalist. This distinction matters, because if heroes represent the entire national community — no matter if it be a farmer in Vietnam, a dentist in Thailand, or someone who carries a weapon or a knife — then the entire movement in 36 KB.. Now, the researchers from the Center for Genome Biology have uncovered a unique piece of DNA in the human genome, an extremely rare and ancient gene. The gene "is one of only three pieces of DNA in human genetic code," explains lead author Michael D.
